Preface

This report on “Italy’s 2009 G8: Plans for the Summit” is compiled by the G8 Research Group largely from public sources as an aid to researchers and other stakeholders interested in the 2009 G8 Summit. It will be updated periodically as plans for the 2009 Summit develop. This report adds material on the physical summit, Italy’s internal preparations and G8 ministerial meetings. For more material in 2008 see earlier versions of this report.

Introduction: Italy’s 2009 G8

Italy will host the G8’s 2009 summit from July 8 to 10. Abruzzo will serve as the summit site instead of Sardinia’s La Maddalena. The announcement to change the venue site came on April 23, 2009, when Italian prime minister Silvio Berlusconi announced the change in the hope of boosting the earthquake-stricken area. The issues of world economy, climate change, energy and nuclear energy. Africa, food security, intellectual property, terrorism and the Heiligendamm process will be on the agenda. The G5 countries of China, India, Brazil, Mexico and South Africa are invited to attend part of the summit, as is Egypt and the additional participants of the Major Economies Forum of Australia, Indonesia and South Korea.

Agenda: The Policy Summit

Stafania Craxi, Italy’s secretary of state, asserted that the fight against climate change was one of Italy’s top priorities for the G8.1 (May 20, 2009, Daily Star)

Italian prime minister Silvio Berlusconi said in early May that tackling piracy and the world economic crisis would be on the G8’s agenda. However, he gave no specifics about plans to combat the pirates who have targeted cargo and cruise ships off the eastern coast of Africa.2 (May 9, 2009, Associated Press Newswire)

In late March Berlusconi dismissed critics of the G8, saying “We are not going to dissolve the G8 … We want to make it more open for the exchange of ideas, which is vital for promoting common interests.” He stressed there was no conflict between the format of the G8 and G20. “We have made clear distinctions between the issues to be discussed in London and in La Maddalena … The crisis broke out over private, not state, debts. The remedy should be found in financial regulations to avoid such crises in the future.” Berlusconi said the agenda for the G8 summit would include terrorism, regional conflicts, food security, energy, climate change, poverty and a new development concept which would now be based on targeted investment.3 (March 30, 2009, RIA Novosti)

Italy, in early February, had set five priorities for its 2009 G8. First came the financial and economic crisis and the search for new proposals for stability and growth. According to Frattini, these can be identified and adopted together with the G20 in a “spirit of collaboration and not competition.” Second came the battle against climate change, to ensure the success of the Copenhagen conference, which will define the global post-Kyoto guidelines. Frattini stressed the need for the major polluting countries — the United States, China and India — to follow the example of the European Union and adopt its climate-energy package. Third came the fight against terrorism and nuclear proliferation, which Frattini said were both “threats to democracy” and thus need to be dealt with through the efforts of all countries. Fourth came development in Africa and other less advanced economies. Fifth came regional and global security, which Frattini said were “two faces of the same coin,” with special attention paid to the Middle East and Afghanistan.4 (February 4, 2009, ANSA English Media Service)

The fight against terrorism, aid for Africa and developing countries and combating global warming are Italy’s priorities during its term as head of the G8 this year, Frattini said in early February. He added that Italy also wanted to focus attention on more “multilateral and flexible” global governance, as shown by Italy’s plans to include other important countries in G8 sessions in a more “structured” way.5 (February 4, 2009, ANSA — English Media Service)

Berlusconi said in early January that Italy’s priorities for the 2009 G8 summit include the global economy, sustainable development, energy policy and climate change. “The other points on the agenda will be the fight against terrorism, nonproliferation and disarmament and the stabilization of conflict areas,” he said.6 (January 9, 2009, Dow Jones International News)

The issues at the Italy 2009 summit will remain the same ones as ever: development, the energy crisis, agricultural prices and the fight against poverty, with the mobilization of all the entities (private individuals, public bodies and NGOs).7 (January 2, 2009, BBC Monitoring European)

Frattini has said that terrorism, nuclear disarmament and the situations in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Africa would be on the political agenda, while economic issues to be given priority are reforms to the Bretton Woods system, the development of renewable energy sources, the impact of climate change on the economy and food safety.8 (January 1, 2009, Xinhua News Agency)

Italy’s presidency of the G8 next year will be an occasion for “a new global governance” and to create a more structured relationship between G8 countries and emerging powers, Frattini said in December 2008. At a meeting of Italy’s parliamentary foreign committees, he said the G8 model “should enlarge itself in a flexible manner, involving economic and political players and coordinating with the G20 on economic and financial themes in order to have a complete spectrum” of analysis on global issues. Frattini said terrorism, nuclear disarmament and the situations in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Africa would be on the political agenda, while economic issues to be given priority are reforms to the Bretton Woods system of monetary management, the development of renewable energy sources, the impact of climate change on the economy and food safety. He added that a “global task force” dealing with this last issue would be created, basing its structure on that of the FAO. For the first time ever, the G8’s agriculture ministers will meet to discuss global agricultural resources, he said. Frattini said he planned to meet with foreign ministers from other European Union countries as well as of the remaining G8 countries early next year in order to involve his EU colleagues in setting a common agenda.

The upcoming summit is expected to discuss topics such as the world financial crisis, climate change, anti-terrorism and energy security, Berlusconi said. (December 5, 2008, Thai News Service)

Global Economy

John Lipsky, the IMF’s first deputy managing director, said rising oil prices reflect expectations that the recession may be easing and that demand is poised to recover. The increase reflects “a general improvement in sentiment on signs that the sharpest period of decline in the global economy is over.” Prices also rose on “expectations that the contraction in oil demand may bottom out soon.” Lipsky also said policy makers should find ways to reduce oil price volatility and its consequences on the global economy. The IMF said last month that the world economy would shrink 1.3% this year. It also said Saudi Arabia, the largest producer in OPEC, will see its GDP shrink 0.9% this year, while the United Arab Emirates will decline 0.6% and Kuwait 1.1%. By 2010, the IMF expects the Gulf states to resume expanding, while advanced economies as a whole will have no growth. (May 25, 2009, Bloomberg News)

The G8 will produce a rulebook on finance and economy, according to Berlusconi in early April. “We are aiming at putting together a code that regulates all the protagonists of finance and the economy, and that also is about the oversight of global banks,” he said. (April 2, 2009, Dow Jones International News)

Berlusconi said that while the G20 summit would make decisions toward an overhaul of the financial system, it would be the G8 that would set the main stage. “The G20 will begin to do something, but it’s at the G8 that the new code on world financial and economic behaviour will be drawn up,” he said. “At the G8 we will make our proposal for a global standard, which is international legislation for the financial and economic worlds.”

Italy appears to have lowered its ambitions for its presidency of the G8 this year, no longer hoping to be remembered for a rebuilding of global finance. Economy minister Giulio Tremonti has recently stopped promising “a New Bretton Woods.” Instead, Italy’s contribution to tackle market turmoil and recession will be something called a “legal standard.” This would constitute a set of rules, guidelines and conventions that have mostly been drawn up by the OECD and to which most developed countries already adhere. Details of the legal standard remain undetermined. Tremonti said last week he had still not presented the idea to Italy’s G8 partners. “The Italian G8 presidency plans to put forward a proposal for the establishment of an international ethical legal standard with which all countries will be bound to comply,” the website says. “Such a method will make it possible to establish as convergent a network as possible of legal systems governing financial affairs, in order to safeguard savers and citizens.”

Financial Crisis

The upcoming G8 summit is a good opportunity to search for ways out of the world financial crisis, Berlusconi said. As 2009 president of the G8, as of mid May the Italian government is sponsoring a move to constitute a set of rules in international business and finance — known as global standards — which includes cutting bankers’ salaries. “In the last few years, bankers acted like King Midas,” Tremonti said. He is working with the OECD to boost global governance rules and help prevent a repeat of the global financial crisis that was at the root of the current world economic downturn. “The crisis has revealed the level of interdependence among our nations, but it has also revealed deficiencies of our governance frameworks. It is time to change,” said OECD secretary general Angel Gurria. “We need more reliable, compact principles, agreed among the largest number of countries possible.” At a February G8 meeting of finance ministers in Rome, Tremonti pointed to topics covering bribery, corporate governance, money laundering and tax havens as part of the global standards initiative. The Italian-sponsored plan also aims to find a way to cap bank executives’ salaries, said an Italian government official. Italy may present a global standards report to the G8 and to developing countries such as China and India present at L’Aquila.

15 Russia Today (May 16, 2009), “Moscow and Rome eye G8 expansion.”
Revising market regulations and restoring order on financial markets are pivotal for the Italian presidency of the G8, Tremonti said in February. “There is a fundamental asymmetry between the structure of the market, which is global, and its institutional structure, which is not global.” He explained that the “market has opened up while rules and regulations have progressively fossilised. The market is global while the laws governing it are local and continue to become less uniform.” The G7 and G8 “are limited in respect to the world’s wealth. But the G20, too, is not representative because it leaves out important economies in the Arab, African and Asian worlds.”

The 2009 G8 summit will focus on the “financial tsunami” that hit the global economy. Tremonti has talked on several occasions about the need to “redesign the Bretton Woods” agreement. The global financial structure established after World War II seemed “out of date facing the current global challenges. The issues will be discussed in this year’s summit. The G8’s global is to strengthen financial institutions, restore confidence in the financial system and provide a sound economic footing for citizens and businesses.”

Italy is planning to host a 14-state summit in March 2009 on the “human dimension” of the world financial crisis.

Currencies

Russia intends to raise ideas at the upcoming G8 summit for making its currency, the ruble, a viable global reserve money, President Dmitry Medvedev said. He wants to discuss making multiple currencies attractive enough for states to hold as reserve currencies and use as means of payment in international trade, alongside the currently dominant U.S. dollar. “We have spoken about the possibility of using the ruble for this purpose … We are not dropping this idea.” Like Russia, China has also increasingly criticized the dollar-dominated global currency system and has been pushing for wider use of the yuan. Russia also suggested spreading the influence of the ruble ahead of the G20 summit in April in London, but the ideas have been more or less ignored. “These are all issues for the future,” Medvedev said, “but in my opinion they are issues for the near future.”

Derivatives

In January Berlusconi said that there was worldwide concern about the expansion of financial derivatives and he would propose a solution to the G8. “I am already working with the G8 nations, the concern is worldwide, there is concern about the derivatives market. I have my own idea on the matter, which I will put forward, the size of this market isn’t known to anybody.”

Toxic Assets

In January, Tremonti said he was in favour of a “moratorium” to separate banks’ toxic assets from their healthy ones.

Hedge Funds

Tremonti wants to destroy hedge funds — the whole “hellish $2 trillion industry.” And when Italy takes over the presidency of the G8 nations in January, he’s going to get on the case.

Trade

The G11, which includes Croatia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Georgia, Honduras, Indonesia, Morocco, Pakistan, Paraguay, Sri Lanka and Jordan, signed an agreement in mid May that will likely help member states sign free trade accords with the G8 countries. At their third summit the G11 focused on fostering co-operation and dialogue with the G8.

The G8 leaders will aim for make a breakthrough in the Doha round when they meet in Italy. “We agreed to work with our G20 partners on making headway on Doha at the G8 summit” in Italy, where “the G8 leaders will meet the leaders of the main emerging countries,” said EU commission president José Manuel Barroso in April. “Obama has shown his willingness to make a commitment and he has said so clearly.”

Italy will use its G8 presidency to try to revive the long-stalled Doha round of world trade talks. A “positive conclusion” to the negotiations, which have been stalled for years, could “make a contribution” to the recovery of the global economy, Frattini said in March. In particular, a new trade accord would help reduce the impact of the global economic crisis on developing countries. The Doha round began in 2001 but has repeatedly stalled on key issues such as agricultural subsidies, tariffs, services and workers’ rights. The most recent efforts to revive discussions, led by the U.S., China and India, have made little impact.

Climate Change

Japanese prime minister Taro Aso plans to announce June’s Japan’s emissions target for greenhouse gases for 2020, but opinion among attendees at a key panel meeting on global warming remained sharply divided over the extent of the cut. The government will settle on a target after meeting with ministers and other officials. The government will choose a midterm target from six options — ranging from a 4% increase to a 25% reduction from 1990 levels — to succeed the 6% reduction goal from 1990 levels under the Kyoto protocol, which expires in 2012. “I’ll announce Japan’s position by mid-June, and I hope this will lead on to July’s Group of Eight summit meeting and the UN Climate Change Conference at the end of the year.”27 (May 26, 2009, Yomiuri Shimbun)

U.S. president Barack Obama is apparently scheduled to chair a meeting on energy and climate change at the G8.28 (May 17, 2009, Angolan Press)

Britain’s Prince Charles said in April that he was impressed by Berlusconi’s offer to look at climate change. Italy could help pave the way for a “historic accord” at a climate change conference in Copenhagen in December. “I am anxiously awaiting news of progress in this direction,” said the prince, who discussed his Rain Forests Project at the G20 on April 2.29 (April 27, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Italy will host an international conference on climate change on the sidelines of the G8. Obama has called for a Major Economies Forum meeting to take place in Washington on April 27-28 to prepare for the meeting in Italy. Topics on the meeting’s agenda will include prospects for low carbon technology, the safeguarding of biodiversity and negotiations ahead of December’s UN climate change conference in Copenhagen.30 (April 1, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Italy will take a strong stance in combating climate change. The group will welcome decisions made in Bali as the foundation for reaching a global agreement on the UNFCCC by 2009. The goal is to establish an effective and ambitious global post-2012 climate regime and all major economies need to commit to meaningful mitigation actions. It will be “a very ambitious project” for the G8 summit, government sources said in early January.31 (January 3, 2009, Xinhua News Agency)

The EU plans to check to what extent Russia’s energy proposal comply with the European Energy Charter and with the talks on Russia’s accession to the WTO, and it ready to discuss these issues at the G8 and G20 formats. “Once we have been able to thoroughly study the proposals, the EU will be please to discuss the set of ideas in the context of the G8, G20 and EU-Russia energy dialogue,” said Marc Franco, head of the European Commission delegation to Moscow.\(^\text{34}\) (May 20, 2009, Interfax: Russia & CIS General Newswire)

Italian economic development minister Claudio Scajola will lead the meeting, Frattini said, adding that “Italy’s entire diplomatic and political corps is preparing this event.”

Africa

Africa will be at the centre of Italy’s G8 this year, Frattini said in March. He said the global economic crisis must not draw attention from the needs of developing countries. Italy will propose “innovative” ways of solving Africa’s problems. “State aid alone is not enough,” he told a conference of scientists from the G8 and G5 and Egypt. “We must involve all the actors in civil society and NGOs, use public and private investment and implement new funding mechanisms.” Frattini stressed at the outset of Italy’s G8 term that Italy wants Africa to be central to the group’s discussions this year. He made a four-country tour of Africa in January, saying Africa should be “at the centre of the agenda” of the summit. “As G8 president Italy is not presenting formulas but is calling for assessment from the African leadership,” he said. The G8’s approach requires African countries to work together on “energy, the environment, security, food security and infrastructure.” In March, Italy hosted a conference on boosting African infrastructure. Participants vowed to help Africa through the global economic downturn and aid its recovery when the worst is over. Italy will propose “financial mechanisms that mitigate risk and foster greater funding from private groups” at the 2009 summit. “Major infrastructure projects require a large mobilisation of capital,” a government official said, stressing that “it can’t all be entrusted to state aid … Private capital is needed and in order to increase these flows we must use instruments that reduce the risk for this kind of investment.”

Development

Italy has vowed to help Africa through the global economic downturn and aid its recovery when the worst is over. Foreign affairs undersecretary Vincenzo Scotti reiterated in March that Africa will be one of the priorities of the Italian G8 presidency. He said Italy will propose “financial mechanisms that mitigate risk and foster greater funding” from the private sector. “Major infrastructure projects require a large mobilisation of capital,” he said, stressing that “it can’t all be entrusted to state aid.” He added that “private capital is needed and in order to increase these flows we must use instruments that reduce the risk for this kind of investment.”

Advocates of the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD) will present a detailed report on the effects of the global financial crisis on Africa to the G8 later this year. According to Egyptian deputy international and economic affairs minister Mohamed Alorabi in January, the founding committee of NEPAD, which includes South Africa and Egypt, is concerned that G8 countries are beginning to look internally to focus all their resources and efforts on reducing the negative effects of the financial crisis at home. Alorabi said South Africa and Egypt wanted to present a united front to the G8 to persuade it not to abandon its earlier commitments and plans to invest in the continent. “They know and agree that this will help our continent to stay on course of trading its way out of poverty … and that it will be in their interest to sustain if not expand the economic growth that Africa has experienced over the last few year.” Alorabi met South Africa’s deputy finance minister Nhlanhla Nene, deputy foreign minister Fatima Hajaig and senior officials during his two-day visit to South Africa in January. He said the G8 countries might introduce measures to ensure stability in their own markets. However, both South Africa and Egypt would endeavour to revive the enthusiasm with which the G8 had met the NEPAD proponents under the leadership of former president Thabo Mbeki. “We need to remind them about the sound NEPAD principles, which are key to this continent’s ability to achieving the Millennium Development Goals in particular. Not enough has been done or implemented from the undertakings of the past G8 summits, hence the need to sustain the momentum of keeping Africa on their agenda.”39 (January 19, 2009, Business Day)

Food and Agriculture

Japan is planning to spearhead a drive at the G8 summit to prevent “farmland grabbing” in developing countries and encourage responsible investing in agriculture. The move shows growing fears among leading countries that rich countries such as Saudi Arabia or South Korea, which are not self-sufficient in food production, are investing in overseas land, particularly in Africa, to boost their food security. The trend to invest in overseas farmland is contentious, with some saying it represents a “neo-colonial” race to secure water and fertile soil with little benefit to local populations, while others say the investments can boost economic growth and provide jobs in poor countries where farmland and water are abundant. Although the UN’s FAO, the World Bank and the AU are drawing up guidelines, agriculture officials say a G8-backed plan would have more force. The fact the issue would be discussed at the G8 summit showed concern about current investments. Japan will propose the initiative at the summit, where food security will be a top issue.

(May 25, 2009, Financial Times)

Global food production needs to double by 2050 to avert the risk of scarcity and high prices hurting international stability, says a policy document in early April for a G8 meeting on agriculture. “Without immediate interventions in agriculture and agri-marketing systems, the 2007 crisis will become structural in only a few decades,” it says. The document was drafted by the G8’s Italian presidency ahead of a meeting in Treviso on April 18-20. It says a further food crisis will have “serious consequences not merely on business relations but equally on social and international relations, which in turn will impact directly on the security and stability of world politics.” The meeting was prompted by last year’s price surges, which triggered riots and social unrest across a number of countries. “The issue of price volatility remains a crucial element for world food security,” the report said. “There is a need for a fast increase in agricultural production in developing countries.”

Italy said in January, that the subject of food security and in particular hunger in Africa, would be the central focus of the G8 in 2009. Italy’s Directorate of Development Cooperation is to donate €10 million through the FAO to finance agricultural and rural development programs and improve food security in 2009. The new donation, raising Italy’s voluntary, extra-budgetary contributions to a total of some €60 million, has confirmed the country as one of FAO’s leading donors.

FAO director general Jacques Diouf has already been in contact with Italian authorities about moving forward a plan to create a world network of food and agriculture experts in order to assess future needs and risks globally at next year’s G8 summit. Diouf believes that $30 billion per year must be mobilized in order to double food production to feed a world population of 9 billion by 2050. “In this connection, as president of the G8 next year, Italy bears a historic responsibility,” Diouf said.\textsuperscript{45} (September 17, 2008, \textit{ANSA English Media Service})

A $1.5 billion plan sponsored by Italy, the United Kingdom, Canada, Russia and Norway to encourage drug companies to come up with vaccines that can help prevent pneumonia and meningitis begins June 12, the Italy’s finance ministry said. Italy is the largest donor with $635 million. The plan, known as advance market commitments (AMCs) for vaccines, was proposed at the end of 2005. The operational phase will launch before the G8 finance ministers meet on June 12 and 13. Finding a way to bring medical cures to poor countries has near-universal support, but governments have been reluctant to foot the bill to provide vaccines to poor nations. The U.S., Japan, Germany and France have not yet signed up to the plan.\textsuperscript{47} (May 25, 2009, \textit{Dow Jones International News})

prime minister Gordon Brown will meet in Paris to discuss so-called “innovative financing mechanisms.” Brown is under pressure from a coalition of UK and international campaign groups to back a 0.005% micro-tax on the $1 quadrillion ($1,000 trillion) annual trade in foreign currencies. UK government sources said the task force would boil down a hundred options for raising money and come up with about 10 ideas to submit to the G8 summit in July and the UN General Assembly in September. Brown is sceptical about a currency tax, on the grounds that it would cause distortions in the financial markets unless it were introduced universally.48 (May 24, 2009, The Observer)

The G8 tasked experts to discuss their efforts for peace support for Africa, in cooperation with the UN and regional organizations, and to submit a progress report prior to the Summit in 2009. (Commitment pledged in 2008 at the Japanese Hokkaido Toyako summit)

Political Security

After assuming the G8 chair, Berlusconi said that “we shall have not only personal will, but also authorities for restoring the spirit of the meeting at Pratica di Mare (Italian military base) in relations between Russia and NATO in the issues of non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, fight against terrorism and search for ways out of the international crisis.” He acknowledged the determinative role played by Italy and France in settling the Georgian-South Ossetia conflict. “We managed to avoid not only thousands of new victims, but also the return of the Cold War.”49 (December 21, 2008, ITAR-TASS World Service)

Russian deputy foreign minister Sergei Ryabkov met with his Italian counterpart, Sandro De Bernardin, to discuss Italy’s upcoming G8 presidency for 2009. “Special attention was paid to Iran’s nuclear programme, the construction of a new European security architecture, as well as the situation in Afghanistan and the Trans-Caucasian region,” the Russian foreign ministry reported. The diplomats of the two countries called for “continuing an active dialogue on a wide range of international issues.”50 (December 1, 2008, ITAR-TASS World Service)

The G8 countries agreed that transfers of enrichment equipment, facilities and technology to any additional state in the next year [2009] will be subject to conditions that, at a minimum, do not permit or enable replication of the facilities; and where technically feasible reprocessing transfers to any additional state will be subject to those same conditions. Middle East

A “Marshall Plan” for the Palestinian economy will be one of the priorities of Italy’s G8 summit in 2009. “There can be no real peace between two peoples divided by such different living standards,” said Berlusconi in early March as he urged leaders from 70 countries to help raise Palestinian living standards. He reiterated that major hotel groups and top multinational corporations had been contacted with a view to building infrastructure in Gaza and the West Bank, including airports to boost tourism to the Holy Land. Berlusconi also proposed a connection between the Dead Sea, whose water level is dropping, and the Black Sea, to expand arable land and provide energy. He offered the Sicilian town of Erice as a venue for peace talks that would reaffirm a two-state solution. Berlusconi met with Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas and had a working breakfast with leaders including U.S. secretary of state Hillary Clinton, French president Nicolas Sarkozy, UN secretary general Ban Ki-moon and host Hosni Mubarak of Egypt.53 (March 2, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Italy will propose an economic aid plan for the West Bank, including funding for an airport, when it hosts the G8. “We will present a plan of support for the West Bank economy that will include the construction of an international airport capable of attracting a great number of Catholic tourists interested in visiting holy Christian sites from Bethlehem,” said Berlusconi in February. The West Bank initiative will also include “a plan for the construction of hotel infrastructure by the main firms in the sector and a plan for major international groups to set up businesses” in the Palestinian territory.54 (February 23, 2009, Agence France Presse)

Silvio Berlusconi and Gordon Brown reviewed the situation in the Middle East when they met in Rome in February. “We will continue to work for reconciliation within the Palestinian community and for a resumption of the peace process,” Berlusconi said. “The West must do its part through a Marshall Plan for Palestine.” He confirmed that the

In its role as the 2009 chair of the G8, Italy will co-sponsor the March 2 conference in Cairo on the reconstruction of Gaza and aid to the West Bank, Franco Frattini said in February. Berlusconi said in January that Italy is prepared to send troops into the Gaza Strip, devastated by Israel’s three-week offensive to help tackle arms smuggling in the enclave. “We have shown our readiness, though there has not yet been a request. … However, I believe that [requests] will follow shortly.” Berlusconi also said that Italy is continuing to provide aid to the enclave of 1.5 million where some 50,000 people were left homeless by the Israeli offensive. Ban Ki-moon, Amr Moussa, the Arab League secretary general, and European Union leaders met at Sharm el-Sheikh in an attempt to rally support for a fragile ceasefire in the Gaza Strip announced just hours before the summit. After the summit, Hosni Mubarak said that “today could be the start of the end of the Gaza crisis,” adding that a “breakthrough” had been reached. The plans for Egypt to hold a conference were announced at a joint press conference in Cairo with Mubarak and Franco Frattini, who had just returned from a visit to Israel. Frattini stated that participants at the Egyptian-hosted conference were expected to include the UN, EU and World Bank representatives. Norway, which is handling donations for the Palestinians, and Italy, currently chairing the G8, were also expected to attend. Frattini also said that “Italy plans to bring other G8 countries” to the conference.\textsuperscript{57} (January 22, 2009, \textit{RIA Novosti})

\textbf{Afghanistan}

Italy wants to involve China, India, Russia and central Asian countries in finding ways of stabilizing Afghanistan during its G8 presidency this year, foreign ministry undersecretary Stefania Craxi said in February. “Afghanistan is one of the key issues of the Italian presidency and we’ve been saying for a long time that it’s necessary to find a regional approach to stabilizing the country,” said Craxi. Craxi recalled that Italy is already working toward a regional conference aimed at stabilizing Afghanistan and Pakistan expected to take place in Trieste. G8 countries, the emerging economies of the G5 and Egypt have also been invited to attend the conference in June, Franco Frattini said. Italy is also keen to involve Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Turkey in a bid to draw up the first road map to defuse the Islamist terrorist threat “which has its roots and bases in Afghanistan and Pakistan.” “This conference represents the model of governance we have in mind,” said Frattini, who has stressed Italy’s main goal for its G8 term will be to foster moves towards a new global governance for economic and security issues.

Frattini said in December 2008 that Afghanistan will be one of the G8’s main priorities for the Italian hosts in 2009. Afghanistan will be one of the “political priorities” of Italy’s presidency, he said during a Christmas message to Italian troops stationed abroad. “Under the Italian presidency, the world’s largest players will focus on perhaps today’s most important theme of world security,” he said, adding that Italy plans to host a meeting of G8 foreign ministers in June to focus on “stabilising” Afghanistan and Pakistan. China, India, Turkey, Saudi Arabia and Egypt may also participate in the meeting expected to be held in Trieste. Earlier this month Italy said it would increase its number of troops in Afghanistan by 500 to 2800 for six months next year in the face of a “delicate operational situation” in western Herat province.

Terrorism

The G8 stressed the urgent need for full implementation of existing standards, including Financial Action Task Force (FATF) Special Recommendations VIII and IX, and asked their experts to take steps to share information, evaluate threats, assess new trends and promote implementation and review these efforts by 2009. The G8 countries committed to issue a final report on the Heiligendamm process at the 2009 summit. (Commitment pledged in 2007 at the German Heiligendamm summit and reiterated in 2008 at the Japanese Hokkaido Toyako summit)

Outreach and Expansion

“The Group will become the Group of Fourteen because Mexico, China, India, Brazil and other countries will join in on the second day. And then Indonesia, South Korea, Australia, the Netherlands and Turkey will also take part. That will be the next day so we will be able to touch upon a variety of issues,” Silvio Berlusconi said. Poor and developing countries will have a strong voice at this summer’s G8, promised Giampiero Massolo, Berlusconi’s personal representative. Massolo was participating in the Civil G8 Dialogue, a two-day meeting of non-governmental organizations in Rome on May 5. He pointed out that it was impossible to address the issues on the G8 agenda without the presence of developing countries.\(^6^2\) (May 5, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

In late March Berlusconi dismissed critics of the G8, saying there were no plans to dissolve the international forum. “We are not going to dissolve the G8. We want to make it more open for the exchange of ideas, which is vital for promoting common interests.” Berlusconi stressed there was no conflict between the format of the G8 and G20. “We have made clear distinctions between the issues to be discussed in London and in La Maddalena.” He added: “The crisis broke out over private, not state, debts. The remedy should be found in financial regulations to avoid such crises in the future.” Berlusconi said the agenda for the G8 summit would include terrorism, regional conflicts, food security, energy, climate change, poverty and a new development concept which would now be based on targeted investment.\(^6^3\) (March 30, 2009, RIA Novosti)

Italy thinks Russia should become a full-fledged member of the G8, including the financial G8, Franco Frattini said in late February. “As a country holding the rotating presidency of the G8 group of the world’s industrialized nations, we press for the financial G7 to become a full-fledged G8 at last,” he said. “The goal has not been achieved yet, but we hope for an early solution.” Frattini said it remained to be seen whether that could be accomplished this year. However, “it is important that we have started to pave the way.”\(^6^4\) (February 28, 2009, ITAR-TASS World Service)

Berlusconi said in late February he would use the G8 to work toward a “more stable and structured” association of the G5 as well as Egypt that “represents the Arab, Muslim and African worlds.” He also noted that it is important to talk about specific issues with groups of countries, such as African ones. Berlusconi said it “would not be easy to organise a G8 summit with these aims, but I’m sure we’ll succeed.”\(^6^5\) (February 23, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

The G8 has to involve emerging market economies more in fighting the global crisis, Berlusconi said in mid-February. “To be successful in tackling the global economic crisis, we must involve the main emerging economies.” He added that “the G20 process started in Washington does already fully involve them, and the Italian presidency wants to reinforce the dialogue already started with Brazil, China, India, Mexico and South Africa, through a stable and structured partnership.” Italy also plans on including Egypt in the G8 summit. Berlusconi said he was committed to including African leaders and others.\(^6^6\) (February 19, 2009, Reuters News)

Russia will become a full member of the G8, including the financial G8, in 2009, deputy prime minister and finance minister Alexei Kudrin said in mid-February. Franco Frattini said in early February that during its term at the G8 helm Italy will seek to institutionalize a more structured relationship between the G8 and key countries outside the group including China, India, South Africa, Egypt, Brazil and Mexico.68 (February 4, 2009, ANSA- English Media Service)

Italy will consider expanding July’s G8 leaders’ meeting into a G20, if a follow-up is needed to the April G20 London Summit. “If after the G20 summit in London there is a need to talk about financial matters in the same format, we don’t exclude making space for it at La Maddalena,” Italy’s G8 sherpa Giampiero Massolo said in late January. “We are not asking for this but we are prepared to dedicate part of the summit to such a meeting … It depends how London goes and how the crisis develops between April and July.” The remit of the G8 is to tackle global challenges from the economy to the environment. “There is no competition between the formats,” said Massolo. “The G8 has the advantage of being a like-minded group but it is today less representative. The G20 summit is a promising format for resolving the global financial crisis.” Berlusconi wants to speed up the G8’s very slow expansion. Italy argues that while a decade ago the G7 (before Russia joined) represented 80% of world economic output, it now represents only half and must expand to include the likes of China, India and Brazil to remain relevant. But Massolo said there is “no consensus yet” to transform the G8 into a G13 or G14, with some countries cautious, others such as Italy “more flexible” and the new U.S. administration’s position still a “factor of uncertainty.” In the meantime Italy hopes to “make dialogue between the G8 and the G5 [China, India, Brazil, South Africa and Mexico] more structural, permanent and on an equal footing” and include Egypt to give a higher profile to Africa, Muslims and the Arab world.69 (January 28, 2009, Reuters News)

The new feature of the G8 will be the “flexible format.” According to Massolo, the secretary general of the foreign ministry and G8 sherpa, in early January, “the issue of the format has taken on the standing of a true issue of our chairmanship; it is not a case of reiterating mechanisms which have already been tried out in the past, such as outreach, but liaising in a permanent and structured way with the emerging economies, combining representatives and efficiency. From now on there will no longer be a single format for managing all the global challenges.” The Italians will try and create a better balance; for example, between the G8 and the G20. “There is no competition between the two formats. In fact, there is a spirit of great coordination, although we believe that the structured relationship between the G8 and emerging countries is to be defended, because, unlike other formats, it allows real discussion among leaders.” The traditional

Italy plans to step up involvement of the G5 and other important non-G8 countries during its presidency of the G8, Silvio Berlusconi said in early January. The G8 will meet on the first day and the G5 as well as Egypt will be brought in on the second day. Italy has pressed hard for an Egyptian role because of Egypt’s status in the Middle East and Africa where it is “widely heard,” Berlusconi said. Italy’s presidency will be an occasion for “a new global governance” and to create a more structural relationship between the G8 and emerging powers, Franoc Frattini said.\(^{71}\) (January 1, 2009, Xinhua News Agency)

Italy is going to invite the leaders of Brazil, India, China, South Africa, Mexico, Egypt, Indonesia, Australia and African Union to the event, Silvio Berlusconi said in early December 2008. Leaders of the G8 will hold talks on the first day. They will meet with their counterparts from China, India, Brazil, Mexico, South Africa and Egypt on the second day, Berlusconi said. The third day will include a meeting that gathers leaders of the above 14 countries and also delegates from Australia, Indonesia and other major African countries, he said. Italy has pressed hard for an Egyptian involvement because of Egypt’s status in the Middle East and Africa, Berlusconi said. The upcoming summit is expected to discuss such topics as the world financial crisis, climate change, anti-terrorism and energy security, he said.\(^{72}\) (December 5, 2008, Xinhua News Agency)

Berlusconi said rapidly growing emerging economies such as China and India would be fully involved during Italy’s 2009 presidency of the G8. The Spanish government considers Berlusconi’s invitation to the G8 summit “historic” since it will be the first time that Spain will attend the gathering in an official capacity. The invitation will allow Spain, which has attended the last two G20 meetings in Washington and London, to be present at the G8 as well. The EU has earmarked €500 million in aid to assist the quake-hit city of L’Aquila. The decision comes as the region prepares for the G8. All sessions, meetings and news conferences of the July G8 summit will be held in a military compound of the Financial Guards’ school on the outskirts of the earthquake-stricken Italian city of L’Aquila. The school is located in a mountainous area of 45 hectares, surrounded by a wall over 2 kilometres long. “Security conditions here are even better than those on La Maddalena,” Berlusconi said in early May. “Reporters can also stay there on the spot rather than at a distance, as was the case in Scotland and Japan. Italy is planning to suspend the Schengen accord, which allows passport-free movement within Europe, “for a suitable period” as part of its measures to guarantee security during the G8 summit in July, interior minister Roberto Maroni said. At a G8 security meeting, Maroni said the dates would be approved in an upcoming Cabinet meeting and that the European Commission would be informed.

Italy is now planning to host the G8 leaders at a finance police compound in Coppito, a few kilometres south of L’Aquila in Abruzzo. The compound normally serves as a school for inspectors and superintendents. Berlusconi inspected the venue along with a small number of his aides, including the civil defence chief. The venue can only be reached by helicopter and the earthquake that occurred at the beginning of April caused cracks in the walls, which will need plastering. The rooms and barracks can hold approximately 5,000 beds. Berlusconi also wants there to be space for delegations and journalists.

Building and infrastructure work being done in Sardinia ahead of the G8 summit that had been scheduled to take place on the island of La Maddalena “will remain,” Franco Frattini said. “In Sardinia the infrastructures are already in place and they will be used in many other ways for public or private initiatives. They will be able to host other international summits … They are works useful to the Sardinians, which will obviously remain. They are not, and were not, just for the G8.” Frattini said the plan to move the summit was based on “the important issue of economic savings, which will be channelled into reconstruction” for the quake-hit central Italian region of Abruzzo. But it was also “to show to the world a model of efficiency and speed in reconstruction and demonstrate that that region, so badly hit, will already be on the road to recovery in July.” La Maddalena mayor Angelo Comiti criticized the decision to move the summit, saying the decision to award the island the honour had been to “reward” its contribution to national defence, after it hosted an American naval base for 35 years. “A premier can’t just wake up one morning and decide something like that, which isn’t like moving a birthday dinner for 20 school friends.”

“What venue could be more appropriate?” Berlusconi asked after deciding to move the G8 summit from La Maddalena to the city devastated by the April 6 earthquake that killed 295 people. Moving the venue would send a “message of hope” to the entire region of Abruzzo, Berlusconi said. “I think it could work out very well.” Officials cautioned that the other G8 heads of government would need to be consulted. But Berlusconi appeared determined that America’s Barack Obama, Germany’s Angela Merkel, France’s Nicolas Sarkozy, Britain’s Gordon Brown and others should hold their three-day meeting at the new site. About 5,000 people including delegates, security officials and accredited media representatives are expected, and many more will be needed to feed and accommodate them. Berlusconi said the meeting could be held in an academy just outside L’Aquila for training non-commissioned officers in Italy’s militarized revenue guard. Moving the summit would allow the Italian government to divert about €220 million. Doubts had already been expressed about the wisdom of La Maddalena as a venue. There were reports that the island had created a logistical nightmare for planners.\(^95\) (April 24, 2009, The Guardian)

On April 23, 2009, Berlusconi shifted the G8 summit site from La Maddalena, in Sardinia, to Abruzzo. The Italian government claims that the change was made to boost the areas struck by the earthquake on April 6.\(^96\) (April 23, 2009, G8 Summit 2009)

Italy is working to make sure July’s G8 summit will be secure. Italy was already “monitoring major flows” of potential troublemakers and would suspend the Schengen free-movement accords for the duration of the summit. There will also be special border controls to weed out those seeking to disrupt the summit.\(^97\) (April 3, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Italy is urgently seeking cruise ships to put up world leaders and delegates for the G8 summit. Italy will host approximately 25,000 people for the event. The civil protection authority is in charge of the summit’s organization and has posted a tender for ships on its website. Offers were to be submitted by April 7. The MSC Fantasia, a 333-metre-long cruise liner that can carry about 4,000 passengers, will host most of the heads of state, government leaders and their delegations. It is unclear whether it will be able to dock on the La Maddalena island. If it cannot, passengers would have to be ferried back and forth. About 16,000 security force personnel will be deployed for the summit. There are 4,500 journalists expected. They will be based in a press centre on mainland Sardinia, 50 kilometres (30 miles) away from the summit premises.\(^98\) (April 1, 2009, Reuters News)

A cruise ship will be used to ensure there is sufficient lodging at the G8 summit. “Work is going on day and night, seven days a week. But if the space we have planned is not enough, we will resolve the problem with a boat,” said Silvio Berlusconi. Italy’s efforts to get the military base, which the U.S. abandoned last January, ready for the G8 summit has run into a snag with the EU for allegedly breaching EU environmental laws. The European Commission sent Italy a second warning of possible legal action over a “simplified legal regime” adopted by Rome for the works that means building can commence prior to the completion of environmental impact assessments, contrary to EU law.\(^99\) (March 20, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Berlusconi’s plan to adorn the G8 summit with ancient bronze warriors currently held in a museum hundreds of kilometres away from the summit site is worrying art officials and angering citizens. Officials in Reggio Calabria said that Berlusconi wants to move the fifth century BC Riace Bronzes from the National Museum of Greater Greece so that world can marvel at them during the summit in July. Since Berlusconi’s plan was floated, polls have shown most Italians oppose it. Giuseppe Scopelliti, mayor of Reggio Calabria, was considering the proposal but will ultimately follow popular sentiment.

Italy will become a more visible target for terrorists when it takes over the G8 presidency next year, Frattini said. He said that Italian intelligence showed “unequivocal signs” of a “fresh upsurge of activity by the al Qaeda network against the West” but added that Italy was not singled out “in a targeted way.” The minister reiterated his plans to include non-G8 countries in the G8 discussions “from time to time” and “for a series of big issues.” He asked, “How can we deal with international terrorism without the presence of Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and Turkey?” Frattini warned that Italy can no longer be considered only a “logistical base” for terrorists after two Moroccans were arrested on charges of planning attacks on targets in Milan and towns in the Lombardy region. Arrests of suspected terrorists in Italy in the past have largely been connected with the recruitment of suicide bombers to be sent to Afghanistan and Iraq.

Silvio Berlusconi said that he will meet with Barack Obama next month for talks ahead of the G8 summit. He added that he was speaking “almost daily” with other G8 leaders about this year’s summit. Berlusconi stressed that representatives of many non-G8 countries will join the talks from the second day and that there would be around “90% of the world economy” around the table.

Japan and Russia will discuss “every possible option” to solve a decades-old territorial dispute when their leaders hold talks in July in Italy, including the idea of a partial return to Japan of the four Russian-controlled islands off Hokkaido, Vladimir Putin said in mid-May. “At the [July] talks, [the two countries] will discuss every possible option for the purpose” of concluding a post-World War II peace treaty, Putin said at a joint news conference with Japanese prime minister Taro Aso after a meeting in Tokyo. Every possible option includes the idea of the return of “3.5” of the four islands claimed by Japan rather than the reversion of all of them, which a Japanese daily reported last month as one referred to by former vice foreign minister Shotaro Yachi, according to Putin. “We agreed to explore a mutually acceptable solution” to the dispute involving Kunashiri, Etorofu, Shikotan and the Habomai islet group — known in Japan as the Northern Territories and in Russia as the Southern Kurils, Aso said. ### Other Meetings

During its current term at the helm of the G8, Italy intends to propose a summit of regional organizations to discuss new rules for a system of global governance, Franco Frattini said in early February. A summit of this kind, he explained, would be in line with “the spirit of inclusion and co-responsibility” with which Italy intends to guide the G8 in 2009, also in collaboration with the UN. The AU and the Arab League were among the regional organizations that Frattini said could play a key role in a future summit.\(^{113}\) (February 4, 2009, ANSA English Media Service)

Sherpa Process Meetings

The G8 political directors met in Venice on February 2-3 to discuss preparations for a meeting of the group’s foreign ministers in Trieste on June 25-27 and a political agenda for the G8 summit, the Russian foreign ministry said in early February. “The parties confirmed the need to strengthen the nonproliferation regimes in light of an upcoming NPT [Non-proliferation Treaty] review conference. They also agreed that it is advisable to adopt an individual statement on the fight against terrorism at the summit that would outline measures to counter the radicalization, recruitment and financing of terrorism,” the ministry said. The G8 political directors also underscored the importance of further efforts aimed at building a new world order, including measures to enhance peacekeeping potential in developing countries, primarily African countries. The primary regional issues are the Middle East settlement process and the situation in Afghanistan, including the need for effective measures to stabilize the Afghan-Pakistani border area. They also supported Italy’s initiative to hold a session on Afghanistan involving leading regional players on the sidelines of the G8 foreign ministers’ meeting in June. The Venice meeting also addressed certain conflicts in Africa and a number of key issues on the European agenda.117 (February 4, 2009, Interfax: Russia & CIS Military Newswire)

The G7 finance ministers promised billions of new lending for emerging markets when they met on April 24 in Washington. The risks facing emerging economies in Africa, Asia, South America and Eastern Europe have become so severe that they were impossible to ignore at meetings of the IMF and World Bank. The economies of emerging and developing countries will expand a mere 1.6% in 2009, compared to 6.1% in 2008. The World Bank says that 50 million people have already been thrust into extreme poverty as a result of the crisis. “The financial and economic turmoil that began in advanced economies is now truly a global crisis that is spilling over into developing countries, and with serious repercussions,” said Canadian finance minister Jim Flaherty. France and Germany teamed up to contribute almost $2 billion to a World Bank program to finance infrastructure projects in poorer countries at risk of stalling because of the crisis.125 (April 27, 2009, The Globe and Mail)

The G7 finance ministers have predicted a “weak” economic recovery will start to take hold in the coming months. “Economic activity should begin to recover later this year amid a continued weak outlook, and downside risks persist,” the G7 finance ministers and central bankers said in a statement after their Washington meeting. “We are right to be somewhat encouraged, but we would be wrong to conclude that we are close to emerging from the darkness,” said Geithner. Policy makers have identified the impaired balance sheets of banks as the biggest barrier to recovery.126 (April 26, 2009, Sunday Business Post)

The G7 finance ministers’ communiqué from April 24 highlighted the issues of regulation, new resources for the IMF, new and more positive economic forecasts, the importance of addressing toxic assets, refraining from protectionist measures, volatility in foreign exchange rates and a commitment to action.127 (April 24, 2009, Reuters News)

The G7 finance communiqué will not change its language on currencies. “There is no reason for the paragraph on currencies to change. For the moment, there has been a realignment. There is volatility but no currency that has broken away completely,” a G7 official said. The G7 welcomed China’s commitment to move to a more flexible exchange rate. They also said excess volatility in exchange rates had adverse implications for economic and financial stability, and the group would continue to monitor exchange markets closely.128 (April 24, 2009, Reuters News)

G8 finance ministers are looking at new ways to finance aid for poorer countries, including tax changes, Italian finance minister Giulio Tremonti said. “The hypothesis is to exclude a tiny part of taxes … which for us in Europe would be VAT [value added tax],” to help poorer countries. The IMF and the G7 are worried about growing financing gaps in emerging markets that may send more countries to seek cash from the IMF. “There will be a lot of maturing short term debt in 2009 and it’s not clear there will be rollovers,” said Dominique Strauss-Kahn. “Fewer resources from current account surpluses, increasing need to renew short-term credit; the financing gap for emerging market countries is going to become very large in 2009.” Hungary, Iceland and Pakistan have fallen victim to the crisis in recent months, forcing them to tap into IMF funds. Strauss-Kahn is trying to double its resources to $500 billion for short-term needs. “If there are difficulties,” he said, “it will have an impact in developed countries and it also raises the question in a more concrete way of the Fund.”\(^\text{132}\) (February 15, 2009, \textit{Reuters News})

The G7 renewed its pledge to fight the global recession as members expect the ongoing slump to persist through 2009. They warned against a possible rise in protectionism in global trade and underlined their readiness to make further fiscal spending and tax cuts to boost domestic demand and create jobs in their respective countries. At their February meeting G7 finance ministers issued a statement that said “the stabilization of the global economy and financial markets remains our highest priority … We reaffirm our commitment to act together using the full range of policy tools to support growth and employment and strengthen the financial sector.” The G7 kept a united front ahead of the G20 summit. In line with their stance against protectionism, the G7 countries also maintained their commitment to concluding the Doha round at an “early time.” They said their fiscal policies will be “frontloaded and quickly executed” and consistent with medium-term fiscal sustainability and will mostly rely on temporary measures. G7 finance ministers have urged bold reformed to the world financial system while leaving little doubt that the global economic turmoil is far from over. Tremonti called for a “new world economic order” as he wrapped up the meeting. In a joint declaration, the G7 called for “urgent reforms” of the international financial system and reiterated a bleak outlook for the world economy, after fresh data showed the eurozone recession deepening. The G7 ministers vowed to avoid protectionism and said stabilization of the world economy was their “highest priority.” “We need to begin the process of comprehensive reform of our financial system and the international financial system, so the world never again faces a crisis this sever,” Geithner said, adding that it was key to make the banks “strong enough that they can be supportive of recovery.” To do so “will require ways to bring in private capital, provide public capital when that’s necessary and it’s going to require direct action to try to get credit markets working again.” Strauss-Kahn said restructuring banks damaged by the credit crunch was the main problem facing governments. The G7 reiterated the view of several top delegates that protectionism was a threat to stability. (February 14, 2009, Agence France Presse)

G7 finance ministers are expected to renew commitments to better regulate and supervise banks and financial markets when they meet in Rome, but renewed promises may be as far as it goes. Information gleaned from officials in recent days indicates that stopping the rot of recession is the top, and perhaps sole, priority right now, even if reformers keep working away at rule changes to make markets less crisis-prone in future. Some officials, however, say negotiators are getting close to agreeing on expanded membership of the FSF. South Korea hopes it will be among those allowed to join the expanded FSF, and is awaiting news as early as the end of this week at the G7, said Choongsoo Kim, Korea’s ambassador to the OECD. Others are less sure the names will come so fast, and big as that news may be for any new entrants, other outstanding issues are whether and to what extent the FSF, for now a moving circus of regulators and supervisors with a small secretariat, is turned into a more global rule-making institution. That, officials say, is still a work in progress, even if the state of play in those negotiations is broached by FSF head and Italy central bank governor Mario Draghi in talks with ministers and central bankers in Rome. What to do, concretely, about supervising crossborder banks better controlling derivatives trading, or being more vigilant about tax havens and the role of credit rating agencies is all still under debate. Some officials suggest it will be hard to conclude even when the G20 meet on April 2 for a summit Gordon Brown is billing as the time to deliver on reform pledges G20 leaders made in November at a first summit on the financial crisis. So far the G7 and G20 are working on setting up “colleges of supervisors” to enhance supervision of banks with operations in numerous countries, with a self-set end-of-March deadline to do so. Some officials familiar with negotiations on that issue say the devil is in the detail and that proper supervision requires a more even balance of power within such collegiate groups — between supervisors from a bank’s home country and supervisors in the many host countries where the bank operates.136 (February 11, 2009, Reuters News)

G7 finance ministers agreed during a conference call that they must “act promptly” to repair the battered global economy and markets, setting the tone for their meeting, according to a Japanese finance ministry official. Germany, France and host Italy have been pushing for a comprehensive overhaul of the world financial regulatory system. That might enhance the powers of international bodies such as the IMF and the FSF to enforce tighter regulation and supervision. This meeting is seen as a warm-up for the G20 summit in London in April. That will include China, as well as other big developing economies. Measuring the Obama administration’s support for international financial initiatives won’t be easy. Geithner is familiar to the G7 through his previous role as the head of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and his work in the treasury under the Clinton administration. But finance ministers are uncertain about how much power he wields. The Japanese official said the G7 officials are expected to discuss Obama’s economic policy and worrying signs of protectionism seen across the globe.137 (February 11, 2009, The Wall Street Journal Asia)

The G7 finance ministers and central bank governors will agree on the need for them to respond “rapidly” to fight the ongoing global financial turmoil when they meet in Italy later this week, a senior Japanese finance ministry official said. The official also said it would be better if the G7 can make it clear that they oppose protectionism in global trade. The Japanese official added that some of the member countries may focus on recent developments in the currency market as part of their discussions on the macro economy.138 (February 11, 2009, Thai News Service)

No matter the record-breaking levels in foreign exchange markets recently, currencies won’t be at the top of the agenda at the G7 meeting on Friday. Banking sector weaknesses are the prime concern, along with developing strategies to produce economic growth, and will take up the majority of the agenda. “Other issues beyond foreign exchange would have more impact on growth and investor confidence, so are higher priority,” said John Normand, head of global foreign exchange strategy at JP Morgan in London. “Given their limited time and resources, policymakers will discuss stimulus and

Finance minister and central bank governors representing the G7 are expected to agree on the need to swiftly implement fiscal stimulus plans and further ease credit conditions when they meet in Rome. The leaders will likely argue that such policies are needed to resolve the negative feedback loop between financial instability and deteriorating economic conditions. Tax cuts and public works spending would be expected to boost demand and facilitate a recovery. The attendees are also likely to voice concern over rising protectionist sentiment and the possibility of trade wars. The participants will likely renew their commitments to recapitalizing banks, improving financial market oversight and providing massive amounts of funds through central banks, policies that were agreed upon at the emergency G7 summit held in November. They will also discuss the need for additional steps, such as helping financial institutions remove bad assets from their books.140 (February 8, 2009, Nikkei Report)

This month’s meeting of G7 finance ministers in Rome will start with a dinner to discuss “market integrity and transparency,” while the next day’s events will be kicked off by new treasury secretary Timothy Geithner, an agenda for the event shows. The G7 will be joined by Russia at the meeting on February 13-14, but they have not invited representatives of the main emerging economies such as China, India or Brazil. The meeting will also be attended by the central bank governors of the eight nations and by the heads of bodies such as the IMF and the OECD. The agenda, issued to the participants says the dinner on February 13 will discuss how to set up what Giulio Tremonti calls a “legal standard,” meaning as convergent a network as possible for legal systems governing financial affairs. The document, prepared by the Italian treasury, also shows the main day’s events on February 14, will start with addresses by Geithner and federal reserve chair Ben Bernanke on the world economic outlook. Other lead speakers on the same subject will be Japanese finance minister Shoichi Nakagawa, ECB president Jean-Claude Trichet and German finance minister Peer Steinbrueck. The next topic on the agenda is financial markets, including an update of G20 work. Here the lead speakers are slated as British finance minister Alistair Darling, IMF managing director Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Mario Draghi, FSF head. French economy and finance minister Christine Lagarde will then lead a half-hour discussion on reform of international financial institutions, before two hours are devoted to a broad debate of global issues involving all participants. Issues will include climate change, food security and development issues. There will then be a working lunch during which the G7 final communiqué will be drafted, followed by closing press conferences. A G7 source said the Rome gathering was likely to produce little if anything in terms of concrete decisions. “It will mainly be an occasion to discuss progress made in addressing the global economic and financial crisis ahead of the G20,” the source said.141 (February 5, 2009, Reuters News)

The idea of an international agency to validate different countries’ banking systems is likely to be attractive to the Obama administration as well as to other G7 countries, said Canada’s Jim Flaherty. He made the comments a day after speaking with Timothy Geithner about the upcoming meeting of G7 finance ministers in Rome, February 13-14. He said Canada’s position at the meeting would be that each country must get its own financial system in order but, in addition, an international surveillance body should be assigned this year in order to restore confidence in banks. That body should be the IMF, Flaherty said.142 (February 4, 2009, Reuters News)

Financial leaders from the G7 are likely to reassure markets next week that they stand ready to act to prevent more trouble for the economy, but are unlikely to launch any new major initiatives, a G7 source said. The source said the meeting would aim more at getting everybody on a level playing field in terms of information and getting a feel for what the new Obama administration is about. “So I don’t have very high hopes about the messages that will be sent out, except that I am pretty sure that the G7 will try to send some reassuring messages about the general economic situation,” the source said. “The messages will be along the lines that we are aware that there is a fire and that we are aware that fires could start in other places and if that happens we stand ready to act,” the source said. “I am sure that is the determination of the G7 and that they will be wanting to convey this message to the outside world, but I don’t think that we should look to the G7 this time for any big new initiatives. I think this is more a get-to-know each other meeting,” the source said. “I think everybody will be pushing very hard on messages regarding protectionism, free trade, etc, because there are conflicting messages coming out from various parts of the world.” The source said the G7 were likely to again call on China to let its currency appreciate more. “Maybe the easiest bit to agree on in the G7 is the rhetoric on the Chinese, because they are not in the G7.” The source said the G7 were likely to again call on China to let its currency appreciate more. “Maybe the easiest bit to agree on in the G7 is the rhetoric on the Chinese, because they are not in the G7.” The source said the G7 were likely to again call on China to let its currency appreciate more. “Maybe the easiest bit to agree on in the G7 is the rhetoric on the Chinese, because they are not at the table,” the source said.143 (February 4, 2009, Reuters News)

The euro zone wants the new U.S. administration to cooperate more on foreign exchange policy in the G7, sending a signal of unity that could help to reduce exchange rate volatility which is badly hurting firms, Eurogroup sources said. G7 finance ministers and central bankers will discuss foreign exchange issues in mid February, including currency volatility, said the sources involved in the meeting preparations. “This will warrant a good discussion at the G7 because everyone is concerned about this — about the volatility,” said one source. The former Bush administration favoured a hands-off approach to currencies, insisting markets should take the lead. But citing hopes of a shift in stance under Barack Obama, the source added: “There is one big change — there will be a new U.S. treasury secretary [Timothy Geithner] and hopefully a new philosophy and a new approach to coordination.” According to a Euro-zone source, “our concern is to avoid strong fluctuations and to maintain calm on the foreign exchange market in a time of crisis.” Exchange rate volatility would not be the main concern of the G7 during the recession in the United States and Europe, a global financial crisis and fears of deflation, but it still deserved attention, sources said. “The fundamental problem now with foreign exchange is that companies that rely on those variables to determine their business strategy have absolutely no clue how to hedge their bets,” the first source said. A separate G7 source said last week that the group would tackle the fall in the value of the British pound at the Rome meeting. “More readiness to accept that coordination is the name of the game and that coordination is what the G7 should do, and not that the Americans tell the others what they will do and that the others should adjust accordingly,” the first source said. “If the right signals come from the G7, markets will pick up those signals and interpret them as they should be interpreted,” the first source said. Any intervention was unlikely. “I am not sure that’s on the cards at the moment; there are indicators that are worrying policymakers more than the exchange rate,” said the source. But the very fact that there could be more cooperation between the U.S. and the euro zone could help reduce volatility, the sources said.144 (January 30, 2009, Reuters News)

A G7 source said the fall in value of the UK pound is a problem for mainland Europe and, because of that, will be discussed at regular talks on exchange rate issues at the G7 finance ministers meeting on February 14. “The pound is depreciating. It is obviously a problem for Europe,” said the source, who was described as having first-hand knowledge of preparations for the meeting. “It’s an economic problem. For the moment this does not affect us financially.” The source said the situation on currency markets in general has not reached crisis levels, and that there is no need yet for verbal intervention to try to influence exchange rates.145 (January 21, 2009, Dow Jones International News)

The mid-February finance meeting is likely to focus on measures to bolster financial system transparency. “The main focus will be on boosting transparency, in the financial system, but also from a legal and tax point of view,” an Italian official said. Russia’s finance minister and central bank governor will almost certainly attend, while it remains to be decided whether other countries will be represented at the meeting.146 (January 9, 2009, Dow Jones International News)

The G8 asked the G20 to adopt a “social pact” aimed at recovering confidence and dealing with the global economic crisis, said Silvio Berlusconi. After a G8 social ministers meeting with the key words of “people first,” he said such a pact would “replace pessimism with optimism, mistrust with trust and transform fear into hope … We will assure everyone that we’ll pull out of this crisis by working together and without leaving anyone behind.” The meeting reached an agreement on promoting “sound and effective policies based on common principles to address the human dimension of the crisis.” An estimated 20 million jobs may be lost worldwide by 2010 because of the global economic crisis. The G8 ministers and their colleagues from Brazil, China, India, Mexico, South Africa and Egypt are “very concerned” about the forecasts. Berlusconi also said the “most important factor” in the crisis was for governments to adopt policies which “maintain social cohesion.” He added that “we’re facing two difficult years ahead during which we’ll have to abandon some [planned] measures.”

G8 Interior and Justice Ministers

The first day of the G8 interior and justice minister meeting will focus on the struggle against transnational organized crime through a common international strategy designed to combat Mafioso assets and to counter today’s “multinational crime corporations.” The meeting will also address the issue of migration, dwelling in particular on illegal immigration, on human trafficking and on immigrants’ integration in society. The last day of the meeting will be used to discuss the issue of urban security, the department said, adding that the decision to address this issue in a G8 context for the first time was sparked by increasing international sensitivity towards the relationship between the growing size of cities, security, and the quality of life. “The debate will go on to focus on developments in the field of international terrorism, and on cooperation in that field.” “One of the crucial topics for debate will be the relationship between the struggle against terrorism and respect for the principles of a rule-of-law state.” Other topics for debate will include various aspects of crime related to information technology, and the tools required to combat online pedo-pornography. At the end of the meeting the ministers will approve projects for operational cooperation in the field of security and will adopt a final declaration. In the course of their working sessions the ministers will benefit from the technical input of the Roma/Lyons Group, which comprises the G8 experts in the areas of counterterrorism, law enforcement, high-tech crime, immigration, transport security and criminal legal cooperation.

G8 Environment Ministers

Environment ministers from major rich and developing countries signed a deal to try to slow species loss, but failed to make progress on climate change, despite U.S. pledges of commitment. In 2002 almost every country in the world agreed to a “significant reduction” in the rate of biodiversity loss by 2010, but scientists say extinctions are gathering pace. The G8 and major developing economies signed a charter at their April 22-24 meeting in Italy pledging to tackle deforestation, trade in illegal wildlife, and to boost research into the rate of species loss. “We set objectives on biodiversity for 2010 … but unfortunately we have all recognised they have not been met,” said Italian environment minister Stefania Prestigiacomo. “We are all convinced of the urgency … of intervening to safeguard our biodiversity.” The document emphasized the economic value of biodiversity, particularly for developing countries. It was adopted after Washington dropped opposition to a reference to the future need to pay for the use of wildlife, such as plants employed in medical and scientific research, delegates say. Obama has promised to reduce U.S. greenhouse gases output to 1990 levels by 2020. Developing countries welcomed the positive U.S. approach but expressed disappointment that Washington did not take the first steps in the negotiation. “If the U.S. does not say clearly what it wants, then we cannot move forward,” said Brazil’s environment minister Carlos Minc. “Developing countries, like China, are willing to make cuts, I believe, but there is a climate of mistrust … The U.S. has still not put anything concrete on the table.” The G8 environment ministers meeting brought together ministers from Australia, Brazil, the Czech Republic, China, Denmark, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Mexico, South Korea, South Africa and Sweden for the first time.\(^{154}\) (April 24, 2009, \textit{Reuters News})

“The G8 anti-crisis plans should be coloured green,” said Prestigiacomo after the April 22-24 G8 environment ministers meeting. The delegates spelled out “frankly and clearly” the issues on which G8 heads of state and government should “devote their leadership capacities” at their July summit. These include improving energy efficiency, developing renewable energy, sustainable agriculture and transportation and building and protecting ecological infrastructure. The three-day talks in Sicily also found new momentum toward a landmark deal to fight global warming at the end of the year. The main stumbling blocks are setting targets for reducing greenhouse gas emissions and financing for the greening of developing countries. Brazil’s Minc said “great distrust” remained between North and South. Both sides agreed that they could make “substantial compromises” appropriate to their means and situation. Since the talks were not required to produce decisions, “they allowed for constructive exchanges between the G8 countries and the others,” Minc said.155 (April 24, 2009, Agence France Presse)

Environment ministers from 16 countries have been arguing over how to “raise ambitions” for creating a green future. Describing the three-day G8 environment ministers meeting as “among the most frank,” the United Nations Environment Programme head Achim Steiner described “an impasse on how to move forward and raise the level of ambition.” He said, “Developed countries and emerging economies have already signaled that they are willing to accelerate efforts conditional on a fair deal in Copenhagen … If [stimulus] money is spent to prolong the status quo and is not invested in tomorrow’s economy, we will lose a major opportunity to deal with climate change as well as the possibility of creating a low-carbon economy.”156 (April 24, 2009, Agence France Presse)

A reduction in health risks from lead to children worldwide was high on the agenda at a meeting of environment ministers from the G8. Environment ministers or high-level officials in charge of the environment from 11 countries and the European Union also participated in the talks, including Australia, Brazil, China, India, Indonesia, South Korea and South Africa. Intake of lead is harmful to the functioning of children’s central nervous systems. Risks from lead paints on toys and stationary products are notably high for children. The G8 countries have appealed to the rest of the world to gradually reduce the uses of lead in paints and to share technologies to wipe out lead-containing compounds for houses and buildings. The environment ministers were also expected to take up infectious diseases, worsening air pollution and increasing allergy illnesses that are believed to be linked with global warming. Lead, which can be taken into the human body through air, water, food, dust and soil, negatively affects children’s intelligence levels. Japan had proposed taking up children’s health and the environment as a theme for discussions at the environment ministers’ meeting, a Japanese government source said.157 (April 23, 2009, Kyodo News) taking place in Siracusa at the end of April under Italy’s G8 presidency, Stefania Prestigiacomo explained that the meeting would spotlight climate change policies, ahead of the Kyoto protocol’s expiry in 2012. “We will focus on climate change, with particular emphasis on the wider availability of technologies that are currently only available in limited parts of the world,” she said. “We know that the fight against global warming can only be won if the so-called developing countries, such as China and India, commit to such technologies and join the great global battle. Another crucial issue is biodiversity.”

The April 22-24 meeting will be attended by environment ministers not only from the G8, but also from China, India, Brazil, Mexico, Indonesia, South Africa, Australia, South Korea and Egypt. The Czech Republic, in its capacity as European Union president, and Denmark, which is hosting a pivotal United Nations climate change summit in December, will also attend. A preparatory technical meeting in Trieste at the start of April will focus on low-carbon technology, with the main event starting on April 22. The first two working sessions will focus on climate change, with an emphasis on low-carbon technology capable of promoting economic recovery while reducing carbon emissions. On the second day representatives will seek to flesh out some of the non-binding, post-Kyoto commitments reached in 2008, ahead of the UN climate change summit in Copenhagen later this year. The third day will consider initiatives for 2010, designated the International Year of Biodiversity; as well as consider longer-term global strategies to protect biodiversity. The talks will take place in the 13th-century Maniace Castle.

Japan will propose international cooperation on studies on the impacts of chemical substances on the growth of children at a G8 environment ministers meeting. At the G8 meeting in Italy, Japan will underscore the need for the international community to share data on studies on certain substances, including dioxin, government sources said. At the G8 ministerial, Japan will likely propose analyses of the maternal blood and umbilical cord blood to identify chemical substances that fetuses are exposed to and determine the densities of such substances. At a meeting in the U.S. in 1997, G8 environment ministers adopted a joint declaration calling for further efforts to protect children from harmful substances. scenarios on energy policy with the aim to increase transparency and reduce volatility in the energy markets.” They urged governments and companies “to adopt a long-term view in planning their investments in energy infrastructures.” Italy, which holds the G8’s rotating presidency, hosted the two-day meeting with the theme “Beyond the Crisis: Towards a New World Energy Order.” The final conclusion will be presented for ratification at the G8 summit. Participants included energy ministers from the G8 and the European Union as well as ministers from 15 emerging and oil-producing economies in Asia, Latin America and Africa. Altogether they accounted for 80% of global energy consumption and production. Representatives from eight global institutions including the World Bank and the IMF, and 20 energy enterprises also attended the meeting. During the meeting, the ministers and other participants agreed to enhance energy market transparency and draft new rules for energy commodities, to limit speculation and stabilize market prices. Greater coordination is needed between national energy authorities and multilateral institutions, an alliance between the private sector and the government is essential to spur investments, the ministers said. Plummeting oil prices have been at the core of the talks. The financial turmoil has reduced many investments in energy infrastructures and projects. According to the IEA, 2009 will witness the first decrease in electric consumptions since World War II, and investment in oil-linked projects has dropped by 21% compared to 2008. Energy ministers of industrialized and emerging economies have agreed to coordinate in setting suitable oil prices for both producers and consumers in order to increase market stability. An “ideal level” of price will support both economic recovery and boost investments, the officials said. The meeting called attention to energy shortage in Africa, where social instability, uncontrolled migration and epidemics are partly attributed to the lack of energy resources on the continent. Energy ministers agreed on the priority of increasing electricity access in Africa’s rural areas and developing energy networks across the African continent by increasing investments. “It’s a difficult challenge but we have the power of changing Africa into a prosperous continent,” said Italian economic development minister Claudio Scajola. Reducing energy poverty in emerging economies is strictly linked to cutting fossil fuels’ dependence and changing energy consumption habits in western countries. The ministers also signed a deal to strengthen the International Partnership for Energy Efficiency Cooperation (IPEEC) launched in 2008 in Japan and agreed to establish a sustainable buildings network to promote efficiency gains in residential, commercial and industrial buildings. Energy ministers stressed the need to boost investments in renewable energies, energy mix, low-carbon technologies and energy efficiency in the economic gloom. At the joint press conference after the meeting, Scajola said governments must make progress on carbon dioxide stockage and capture systems and the safe use of nuclear power by increasing research. He said he was satisfied with the meeting’s outcome. “We have reached a positive agreement on most central issues,” he said.161 (May 26, 2009, Xinhua News Agency)

Energy ministers from the G8 said they would increasingly emphasize nuclear energy and the creation of a common low-carbon technology platform as solutions to climate change and supply insecurity. to produce electricity. In a closing statement at their two-day Rome meeting, the energy ministers from the G8 said, “In the opinion of a growing number of countries, the use of nuclear energy can contribute to energy security while reducing greenhouse emissions.” “We encourage all countries interested in the civil use of nuclear energy to engage in constructive international collaboration,” the statement said, while reiterating “the fundamental prerequisite for the peaceful use of nuclear energy.” The G8 energy ministers’ collective statement also announced the operational launch of the new international technology alliance designed to cooperate on energy efficiency and low carbon technologies, the IPEEC. “We recognize the importance of increasing energy efficiency through the entire energy chain,” from transportation to carbon capture and storage projects, it said. The group also said it was looking forward to the activity of a global steering group to look at “technical factors affecting energy market volatility” and “the linkage between financial and energy markets.”

The G8 energy ministers meeting concluded with an action plan aimed at tackling key sector issues. Italian economic development minister Claudio Scajola said that “important decisions” had been made during the two days of talks. He said representatives had continued negotiating throughout the night until the last morning, and “agreement was reached among all participating countries.” The minister declined to discuss the plan in any detail but said it focused on three key areas: the fight against climate change, reviving an alliance between government and business, and the fight against energy poverty. Scajola said a “common framework and shared rules and regulations” were needed and called for greater cooperation between national governments and multilateral bodies. The meeting was attended by energy ministers and officials from 23 countries, including the G8, emerging economies and oil exporting nations. The action plan agreed on at the meeting will be put before leaders at an upcoming G8 summit. (May 25, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Consumer countries urged producers to keep oil prices stable or risk derailing a fragile global economic recovery, as top exporter Saudi Arabia forecast prices eventually moving toward $75 a barrel. G8 energy ministers were meeting in Rome against the backdrop of a price rally that has sent oil prices to a six-month high of more than $60 a barrel. “If oil prices do spike up considerably, that would be a factor in delaying economic recovery,” U.S. energy secretary Steven Chu said. Claudio Scajola said: “A low oil price helps in times of economic crisis but discourages investment and does not guarantee a future of stability. It is necessary to have an equitable and not volatile price that can guarantee global economic growth and also the possibility of investment.” Oil prices have almost doubled from last December’s low and risen well above the $50 level that Saudi Arabia has said it could live with to help nurse the world economy back to growth. Algeria’s oil minister said an output cut was unlikely when OPEC meets in Vienna. Saudi Arabia, the biggest and most influential player in the 12-member producer group, also said OPEC would “probably stay the course.” Saudi oil minister Ali al-Naimi offered the prospect of prices and demand eventually rising but declined to speculate on when prices would hit the $75 level producers say is needed to encourage investment. “Demand will pick up eventually when the economy recovers,” Naimi said. “Eventually could be tomorrow or it could be 10 years from now, but eventually it’s going to happen, but when I don’t [know].” Algeria’s energy minister Chakib Khelil predicted oil prices could touch $70 per barrel by end-2010 if the economy recovered, but warned recent price rises were being driven by speculation and a weak dollar rather than fundamentals. Energy leaders at the summit agreed the financial crisis has dealt a sharp blow to investment in production for the long term. The IEA warned investment in oil and gas production would fall 21% in 2009. “The experience of the last price cycle demonstrated that to ensure steady economic growth, prices should not rise higher than $75 per barrel,” Poli said. “Oil price instability and unpredictability are the worst enemies of any well thought-out plan to build a different energy future.” OPEC ministers are expected to make no change to oil supply at their Vienna meeting as higher prices ease their concerns about overflowing fuel inventories and the deepest fall in demand for years.164 (May 25, 2009, Reuters News)

The head of the Italian energy group Eni called for stabilization of oil prices, pinning a “reasonable” price between 60 and 70 dollars per barrel, in an address to G8 energy ministers in Rome. “Whatever energy future we have in mind, it will be strictly dependant on oil prices,” said Eni chair Roberto Poli. “The persistence of high uncertainties related to oil price up to 150 dollars per barrel or down to 30 dollars might upset the entire energy system blocking investments both in traditional and in alternative sources” including nuclear and renewables, he said. Poli addressed the energy chiefs of the G8 who opened a two-day meeting focusing on the problem of less investment in energy projects and new technology due to the global economic crisis. “There are no magic formulas” for setting reasonable oil prices, Poli said. In order to stabilize oil prices, Poli called on governments to institute more regulation of oil financial markets which “remains so opaque and uncontrollable.”165 (May 23, 2009, Agence France Presse)

At the G8 energy ministerial, Russian energy minister Sergei Shmatko said, “One of the main tasks of the meeting … is to prepare the summit of the heads of state within the G8 framework.” The ministers were to consider coordination of the international energy-saving activity and development of renewable energy sources. The discussion of a conceptual approach to create a new legal mechanism in the sphere of power generation, recently proposed by Russia, will become an important event. “A preliminary analysis of the situation and the work we’ve organized on contacts with a number of countries, have shown that many view this Russia initiative with interest.”169 (May 22, 2009, ITAR-TASS World Service)

Canada’s natural resources minister Lisa Raitt missed the G8 energy ministers meeting after an Ontario nuclear reactor that produces medical isotopes unexpectedly shut down. A deputy minister attended the conference in her stead. “With the pressing issues here domestically it’s more important for us to stay here and look after the house than it is for us to go and represent Canada at the G8,” Raitt said.170 (May 21, 2009, Bloomberg News)

Energy investment is “plunging” because of the recession, paving the way for oil-price surges within three years, the IEA warned in a new report. In recent months, oil companies and investors have canceled or postponed about $170 billion of investment equivalent to roughly 2 million barrels a day in future oil supply. An additionally 4.2 million barrels a day in future oil-supply capacity has been delayed by at least 18 months as companies slash spending. Three key decisions were taken by the G7 health ministers and the World Health Organization, which held the 9th ministerial meeting of the Global Health Security Initiative (GHSI) hosted by the European Commission in Brussels on December 5. G7 ministers agreed that the closure of national borders is not the preferable choice in preventing the spread of the influenza virus during a pandemic. They also agreed on Health ministers from the G7 vowed to continue to take concerted action to improve preparedness for and response to global health threats. The ministers from Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States plus Mexico attended a GHSI ministerial. They agreed on research and development of drugs and vaccines against health threats, on border management measures and virus sample sharing for influenza pandemic preparedness, and on crisis communication mechanisms among their countries. The GHSI was established in 2001 in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks against the United States to strengthen global collaboration on health security by addressing health threats from chemical, biological and radio/nuclear agents and by developing pandemic preparedness.175 (December 5, 2008, Xinhua News Agency)

G8 Agricultural Ministers

At the first G8 agriculture ministers meeting in late April, Luca Zaia, Italy’s farm, food and forestry policies minister and chair, said “The simple solution to the global food emergency is to put farm produce back in the front seat in the economy. To come through this crisis undamaged we must strengthen the industry from the foundation up.” He explained the G8 agriculture ministers would now redesign the future of farming assisted by relevant organizations such as the FAO and the World Bank. He added food prices are sure to rocket once more when the global economic cycle picks up again. “We must cut the waste that comes at a social and economic price we can no longer afford,” he explained. “For every calorie we eat we use up seven just to transport the food.” In a final declaration after the three-day meeting, the ministers pledged to pull out all the stops to alleviate the financial crisis’ impact on hunger and poverty. They undertook to use all available tools to strengthen and encourage sustainable agriculture and food production, increase investments in agriculture and research and avoid unfair competition and agricultural-trade distortions, including export-restrictive measures.176 (May 11, 2009, Main Report’s Profitable Agri-Business)

The G8 agriculture ministers took steps to combat the price speculation that has helped pushed up the cost of basic foods, sparking riots in poor countries. They called for a study into setting up a global system to stockpile essential foodstuffs, following three days of talks in Italy where they were joined by the G5 agriculture ministers of Brazil, China, India, Mexico and South Africa. Ministers from Argentina, Australia and Egypt also attended the talks, as well as officials from the AU, the FAO and the World Bank. “We call upon the relevant international institutions to examine whether a system of stockholding could be effective in dealing with humanitarian emergencies or as a means to limit price volatility,” the ministers said in their final declaration. Host Italy led calls to tackle commercial price fixing, and both Italy and France advocated the global stockpiling of essential foodstuffs. French agriculture minister Michel Barnier said that an international system to manage food reserves would “fight against speculators preying on primary foodstuffs, which is scandalous.” He said the world needed the sort of supply management systems that operate across the European Union. The G8 ministers also lamented that the world is “very far” from attaining the UN goal on malnutrition. Food prices “are still above previous lows in many countries,” the ministers said. “Structural factors may affect prices over the medium term, and increased volatility and demand raise important questions about food security for the future.” Although the recession has cooled soaring prices, officials say it offers only a temporary respite, while activists complain that only a fraction of the $22 billion in aid announced at a UN food agency summit in Rome last June has been disbursed. The ministers also repeated calls for more investment in agriculture. “More should be done to increase the quantity and enhance the quality of agricultural production,” the statement said, calling for increased “public and private investment in sustainable agriculture.” On the issue of biofuels, the statement said: “Renewable energy production … must be increased in a sustainable manner [such that it] does not compromise food security.”

G8 agriculture ministers agreed that control of agricultural exports is undesirable. The agreement was reached at a three-day meeting in Cison di Valmarino, Italy. They also agreed it is necessary to increase farm production to prepare for possible food crises and expand agricultural investment. They adopted a joint statement that would be reflected in the G8 summit meeting in Italy in July. The ministers also emphasized at an extended meeting that small-scale farmers must be supported in increasing production amid a downturn in agricultural investment due to the global financial crisis. On the first day, G8 ministers met on their own before the talks were expanded to include other countries. India explained its measures to support its numerous small-scale farmers, while countries including Mexico, China and Brazil said family-run farms will play an important role in increased production. The gathering of the G8 agricultural ministers, the first of its kind, was agreed to at the 2008 G8 summit.

Agricultural ministers will discuss returning agriculture to a leading role on the international economic and political scene, including boosting the share of farm support in overall aid to developing countries. They will try to tackle how to increase agricultural productivity to reduce the gap between food supply and demand. They will talk about strengthening the economy of rural areas, improving the price and labelling on the international markets and coordinating management of international stocks — either through using the reserves of bigger producing countries or through coordinated interventions on future markets. They will fight against speculative trading and push their governments to combat climate change and improve the management of water resources. The meeting will include agricultural ministers form the G8 as well as Brazil, China, India, Mexico, South Africa, Argentina, Australia, Egypt, the Czech Republic as Ministers of agriculture are expected to focus on a framework for international food security during their meeting in Treviso. They will discuss how to create a global framework to prevent disruptions stemming from food price surges and growing demand from emerging economies. The ministers will also talk about how to increase agricultural production in emerging economies and strengthen agriculture-related investment. Food security, fluctuating food prices and world hunger will be among the key issues on the agenda at the meeting of G8 agriculture ministers. The meeting, from April 18 to 20 in the northern town of Cison di Valmarino, near Treviso, will also deal with increasing productivity in developing countries and the identity of food products. Also attending the meeting will be Czech agriculture minister Petr Gandalovic, whose country is the current president of the European Union, EU agriculture commissioner Marianne Fischer Boel and ministers from Brazil, China, India, Mexico, South Africa and Egypt as well as representatives from the FAO. Italy is particularly concerned over fluctuating food prices.

Italy announced plans to hold a G8 agriculture summit with six emerging economies in April to find ways of beating the global food crisis. “The Italian government proposes to hold a big G8 meeting on agriculture and farm output at a time when the world experiences a serious food crisis with nearly one billion people suffering from hunger,” agriculture minister Luca Zaia said. Italy took over the rotating presidency of the G8 this month. The summit will be held in the northern region of Treviso and be attended by the agriculture ministers of the G8 members. The emerging economies to be invited are Brazil, China, Egypt, India, Mexico and South Africa. Others attending will include the agriculture minister of the Czech Republic, which currently heads the EU, EU agriculture commissioner Marianne Fischer Boel as well as UN and World Bank representatives. The aim of the meeting will be to “minimize” the impact of the food shortages and ways to “increase productivity in developing countries and reinforce rural areas,” according to a government document. Zaia also said he would take steps to protect Italian farm produce. “Nowadays, out of 10 ‘Made in Italy’ products bought on the international market, only one is made in the peninsula,” he said, citing cases of “fake” Parmesan cheese and Prosecco, a dry sparkling wine made from grapes grown mainly in the Veneto region.

Japan has given up a plan to host a meeting of agricultural ministers from the G8 by the end of the year to discuss steps to assuage rises in global food prices, a senior farm ministry official said. Given the ongoing financial crisis in the world, “the farm ministers have no time to gather at one place,” Michio Ide, Japanese vice minister of agriculture, forestry and fisheries, said. The need for such a meeting has also weakened due to a recent downturn in international grain prices, analysts said. Leaders of the G8 agreed during their summit meeting in Hokkaido in July to arrange a meeting of their farm ministers before next year’s summit.188 (November 10, 2008, Kyodo News)

G8 Foreign Ministers

Afghan foreign minister Rangin Dadfar Spanta has welcomed the possible presence of Iran at the G8 foreign ministerial meeting on restoring stability in Afghanistan. The Afghan foreign minister expressed hope that Iranian foreign minister Manouchehr Mottaki would take part in the meeting in Italy on Afghanistan, saying the future of the region will depend on the close cooperation of Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan. He added that the three neighboring countries should make efforts to enhance cooperation in the campaign against terrorism and to establish security and stability.189 (May 26, 2009, Trend News Agency)

Iranian foreign minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Tehran is still studying the invitation by the Italian government to attend an Afghan security conference in Rome. “Iran’s participation or non-participation is under consideration,” Mottaki said on the sidelines of a trilateral meeting of Iranian, Pakistani and Afghan presidents.190 (May 24, 2009, Fars News Agency)

Iran has not yet decided whether or not it will accept an invitation to participate in the G8 foreign ministers meeting. “Since no details are available about the meeting Iran cannot announce definitely that it will or will not attend the gathering,” Iranian foreign ministry spokesperson Hassan Qashqavi said.191 (May 19, 2009, FNA News Agency)

Hillary Clinton is in favour of Iran attending a meeting on Afghanistan in June when the G8 foreign ministers gather in Italy, said Franco Frattini said. He said Clinton expressed “her positive opinion on the subject of the eventual participation of Iran” at the talks to take place in the Italian city of Trieste.” Our objective is to have the Iranian and American foreign ministers seated at the same table,” he added, referring to the talks that will focus on restoring stability in Afghanistan and Pakistan.192 (May 9, 2009, Agence France Presse)

The G8 foreign ministers demanded that the warring factions in Sri Lanka take all necessary action to prevent further civilian casualties. They were deeply concerned about the deteriorating humanitarian situation in the country and the “mass civilian casualties” that have resulted. They condemned the rebels for using civilians as human shields. “It is time for the conflict to end now,” said a statement released by G8 president, Italy. The United Nations estimates that 50,000 civilians are caught in Sri Lanka’s northern war zone, where the military has pushed forward with its offensive to destroy the Tamil Tiger rebels. The rebels have warned they face starvation. More than 100,000 civilians have fled the tiny coastal strip still under rebel control, flooding hospitals in the north and overwhelming government-run displacement camps, according to aid workers. The government has barred aid groups and journalists from the war zone since last year, arguing that it was too dangerous for them to work. International pressure on Sri Lanka has grown in recent days, with the UN sending its top humanitarian official to assess the situation and neighbouring India sending two top officials to demand a pause in the fighting to allow civilians to escape. The G8 foreign ministers were concerned about reports that the injured haven’t been able to move to safety. “Strongly condemning the use of civilians as human shields by the [rebels], the killing of civilians and terrorism in all its manifestations, we call all parties to take all necessary action to avoid further civilian casualties,” the statement said.193 (April 25, 2009, Associated Press Newswire)

G8 foreign ministers will discuss the situation in Afghanistan as well as Afghanistan-Pakistan relations in Trieste on June 25-27. “The ministers will discuss the key issues of global policy, particularly nonproliferation of mass destruction weapons, anti-terror fight, struggle with transnational organized crime, sea piracy and many other regional problems,” said a representative of the Russian foreign ministry.194 (April 16, 2009, ITAR-TASS World Service)

Franco Frattini said that although his visit to Iran had to be postponed, he hoped it still could be scheduled for this month. He had been expected to travel to Iran in the first part of this month to discuss the possibility of Iranian officials attending a June conference in Trieste on the stabilization of Afghanistan and Pakistan that Italy is organizing in its role as president of the G8 for 2009. However, he announced that he had put off the trip because of what he defined as “horrible and unacceptable” statements and threats Iranian officials had made against Israel. Iran has already said it was examining “with interest” Frattini’s invitation to Trieste in June. Aside from Iran, the Italians also want to invite India, Turkey, China, the Gulf states and the Asian republics to the Trieste G8 conference.195 (March 10, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

The U.S. has given an initial green light to Italy’s plans to invite Iran to a regional conference on Afghanistan and Pakistan in Trieste at the end of June, Franco Frattini said. He said he received the go-ahead from Richard Holbrooke, the U.S. special envoy on Afghanistan and Pakistan. “Iran could play a positive role and with the Americans we are discussing how to involve them, not whether to involve them,” Frattini said. from Iran, Italy also wants to invite India, Turkey, China, the Gulf states and the Asian republics.

Art thefts and the protection of artistic heritage will be one of the issues discussed at the G8 foreign ministers meeting hosted by Italy, said Italian foreign minister Franco Frattini. He said Italy will ask participants to agree on a series of global regulations aimed at thwarting art thefts. Culture minister Sandro Bondi will chair the special session on art and illustrate the work of Italy’s special unit police force in preserving its art heritage. The Cultural Heritage Protection Unit of the Carabinieri has gained a worldwide reputation for its work in recovering stolen works and stopping trading. Its research has also led to landmark antiquity returns from foreign institutions such as the Metropolitan Museum in New York and the Getty Museum in California. The special unit recovered stolen archaeological treasures and artworks worth €183 million in 2008, more than double the previous year.

Italy said it was considering inviting Iran to an international meeting on Afghanistan. The conference would discuss securing the borders of Afghanistan and Pakistan to fight the “spillover” of terrorism, drugs and organized crime. The talks will be hosted by Italy in Trieste on June 27, a day after the G8 foreign ministers meet.

Iran said Tehran was considering an invitation by Italy to participate in a meeting on Afghanistan.

Franco Frattini said he wants to invite Iran to the G8 foreign ministers’ meeting on Afghanistan. He plans to invite all nearby countries that have an influence in Afghanistan, including Pakistan, China, India, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates. He added that a way must be found to involve Iran, which is one of Afghanistan’s largest neighbours. “We want to consider how to involved Iran, not whether to involve Iran,” he said. “I’m convinced we will have to find somehow, a way to get Iran involved.” He added, “I don’t know whether Iran is ready to accept or whether all the partners that take part in G8 are in agreement with my idea. But we will be exploring further their support in trying to involve in a positive way Tehran.”

In June, Italian authorities are organizing an international conference on the stabilization of Afghanistan and Pakistan. Apart from the G8, India, China, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, will be involved. Special attention will be paid to anti-terrorism, a new plan on the Iraqi issue following the end of the Bush presidency in the U.S., and to

The Italian foreign ministry said that a meeting on funding African infrastructure will be held in Rome. As president of the G8, Italy will host the meeting of the Infrastructure Consortium for Africa (ICA) on March 10-11. The Italian foreign aid department will arrange a debate on ways of mitigating risk to attract private capital, the ministry said. Donors, funding agencies and risk insurance institutes will discuss problems such as governance with African representatives, said the ministry. The ICA was set up in 2005 following the G8 Gleneagles Summit and aims to meet Africa’s urgent need for growth and development by encouraging the public and private sectors to build power, water and computer networks.207 (March 3, 2009, Xinhua News Agency)

Civil Society and Other G8-Related Activities

Addressing a Rome meeting of non-governmental organizations and civil society representatives, Italian G8 sherpa Giampiero Massolo said Italy’s presidency of the G8 would make a virtue of “inclusiveness.” “This is crucial in order to extend areas of global consensus,” he told delegates attending the Civil G8 Dialogue, which brings together representatives from international civil society to draft a list of issues to raise with G8 leaders. He said it would be impossible to discuss the issues on the summit agenda, which include the financial crisis, climate change, food security and global health without the presence of developing countries. Massolo recalled that G8 host Silvio Berlusconi and U.S. president Barack Obama will jointly chair a forum of developing economies this summer. Massolo praised the “important contribution” made by the Civil G8 Dialogue each year, as well as its “fruitful collaboration” with official G8 organizers.208 (May 5, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

At the two-day meeting of the Civil G8 Dialogue in May, Rome mayor Gianni Alemanno said he will try to organize a meeting between G8 leaders and representatives of civil society at this summer’s summit. He stressed the importance of ensuring civil society had a voice in the proceedings. “If, as I’m certain will be the case, this meeting agrees on appropriate representation and produces a document with clear objectives, then I will ask Premier Silvio Berlusconi to organize a meeting during the summit,” Alemanno said. The proposed meeting would see talks between leaders of the G8, representatives from the Civil G8 and the Italian arm of the Global Coalition Against Poverty (GCAP), which brings together more than 70 Italian NGOs. Alemanno stressed the importance of an event “that will ensure governments listen to the voice of civil society — in the shape of associations representing public opinion — before taking action.” Alemanno urged the 258 delegates from Africa, Asia, Europe and South America to draft a suitable document that could be used by G8 leaders that would provide “answers to the current crisis that are not just based on market and development initiatives but also on solidarity and environmental protection.” GCAP published a document listing its concerns ahead of the meeting, which was expected to form the basis of the Civil G8’s declaration. Top of the list was soaring food prices, which GCAP said rose 85% last year. The list also touched on the global financial crisis, stressing the need for action against the current “distorted” system it said was responsible for the crisis. Climate change was the third issue listed. GCAP said industrialized nations needed to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 25-40% by 2020, with a global cut in emissions of 80% by 2050.209 (May 4, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Anti-globalization activists will lay siege to La Maddalena during the G8. “We will organise a fleet of hope that will break the blockage of the eight powers,” said Francesco Caruso of No Global, explaining that arriving by sea is “the only possible way.” No Global will take its cue from the Free Gaza movement, which is organising a fleet from Cyprus that will sail to the Gaza Strip in May. “If the expedition is a success we’ll repropose it at the G8,” he said. A parish priest has already signed up to help staff the No Global boats during the siege. Franco Frattini warned that Italy “will not tolerate violence” during the summit. “We have activated all the preventive tools to guarantee a safe G8 … People who want to protest must and can do so peacefully, but we will not tolerate violence, extremist groups, people who only want to destabilise things and who have no interest in the solution of the major global questions.”210 (April 2, 2009, ANSA – English Media Service)

Celebrity Diplomacy

Former United Nations secretary general Kofi Annan and musician Bob Geldof urged Italy to keep up efforts to cut poverty in Africa despite the global economic crisis. “In richer countries this crisis is resulting in bankruptcy, unemployment, personal misery and fear for the future,” Annan said. “But for many in Africa, the effects are life-threatening … The impact is profound and deepening.” He cited decreasing trade and foreign investment, diminishing credit and slumping revenues. Annan said hunger will likely increase, school attendance will drop, and women and children will be the hardest hit. Geldof challenged Italian prime minister and G8 host Silvio Berlusconi to prove his leadership by leading efforts to halve extreme poverty around the world by 2015. “Don’t talk to me about the financial crisis,” Geldof said. “Whatever financial crisis we meet, it is life or death” for people in Africa. “This money does not go into some black hole, it goes into an empty stomach.”211 (February 20, 2009, Associated Press Newswires)

The world’s wealthiest countries must maintain their foreign aid in the face of the current economic crisis or risk creating a “human crisis,” musician and activist Bob Geldof said. Before accepting an international humanitarian award from a Winnipeg hospital foundation, the former lead singer of the Boomtown Rats and the founder of Live Aid said, “Governments are always looking for an opportunity to cut the little bit that they give anyway towards the poor part of the world but that’s very short-termist … The issue at hand is not to turn the financial crisis into a human crisis.” International aid is such a tiny part of any national budget, Geldof added. Countries such as Canada have promised to dedicate less than 1 percent of their national budgets before 2010, he said. “That means that for all their domestic travails, they’ve only got 99.95 left to deal with their domestic problems,” Geldof said. “Is that not enough? If it isn’t enough, then that government is a failure.” Although Geldof praised Canada for initially proposing G8 nations dedicate a small portion of their national budgets to help alleviate poverty in Africa, he said Canada now seems to be the “most reluctant” of all the G8 countries to hand over that small percentage of their federal budget. “Canada is suffering as a result of the decline in the commodity’s boom, so is Australia. But Africa is devastated because the vast repository of the world’s commodities are in that continent,” he said. “I don’t believe that when Canadians say something, they don’t mean it. Ultimately, the promise of the powerful to the weak is the most sacred promise you can make. When the rich make a promise to the poor, it’s critical because when you break it, you kill them.”212 (December 4, 2008,

Activities

Italian police fought running battles with thousands of students protesting over the economic crisis on the sidelines of an international meeting of university leaders.
Nineteen police and two demonstrators were injured. The students tried to break through a security cordon around the Valentino castle where 40 university rectors from nineteen countries were meeting as part of a G8 preliminary meeting. The demonstrators hurled rocks and fire extinguishers at police who responded with baton charges and volleys of tear gas. The students tried to attack several nearby banks. The university presidents were discussing the impact of the world economic crisis and durable development. Italy’s policy unions said the clashes were an alarm bell ahead of the G8. “We are very worried because in Turin we have seen scenes of violence that we thought belonged to the past,” Christiano Leggeri of the UGL police union said.213 (May 20, 2009, Agence France

Business leaders from the G8 plan to urge their political chiefs to strike an agreement on trade liberalization talks taking place at the WTO by the end of this year and reduce tariffs, a draft statement for the business gathering stated. The business organizations will also ask their political leaders to refrain from forming new regulations that could hinder trade. The business leaders are scheduled to hold a two-day meeting starting April 23 in Italy. In the draft statement the business organizations also ask the G8 leaders to take coordinated action on fiscal stimuli and they encourage the leaders to take “fair and binding reduction targets” on climate change.214 (April 17, 2009, Kyodo News)

Bocconi University in Milan hosted the G8 Youth Summit in March. The annual gathering began in 2006 and usually takes place in the country where the G8 is organized.

Looking for a common ground, participants discussed the reform of international financial institutions, climate change, economic crisis, energy, environment and poverty. More than 21 national delegations attended, including representatives from China, India, Mexico and Turkey. Organized by young volunteers from the host country with the help of national student teams in the other G8 countries, the summit represents the voice of youths to the G8 leaders. Previous youth summits have been held in Russia, Germany and Japan.

African women are finding it difficult to progress in the business world and those lucky enough to be well educated are finding that the “glass ceiling” is preventing them from achieving the success of their male counterparts. The G8 Africa Infrastructure Investment Conference in London will aim to provide a platform for investors, governments and international funding agencies to discuss business opportunities in Africa. It is hoped that the conference will go far toward convincing investors that targeting opportunities in African infrastructure will provide best value in the challenging global environment. “The main focus of this conference in June is to examine the role of women in business and in society,” one participant said. “African women, especially those of Nigeria, Egypt, Zimbabwe and the Congo, really battle with running their businesses and generating an income for their family. It has to do with culture and lack of education.” The G8 Africa Infrastructure Investment Conference will take place in London from June 29 to 30.

Farmers from G8 countries are aiming to create a global cereals reserve to offset price shocks and reduce speculative trade in grains. A proposal to create global cereal stocks will top the agenda of the first-ever meeting of G8 farmers unions in Rome on March 19, where the farmers will also discuss world hunger, food security, climate change and economic crisis, they said. “The goal is to stabilise prices and protect farmers from speculation,” a spokesman for Italy’s biggest farming group Coldiretti said. Coldiretti will host the meeting in Rome. World cereal prices soared to record highs in 2007 in the first half of last year, fuelling spikes in food prices that triggered riots in some developing countries. Grain prices have fallen back since then thanks to large crops in 2008. “The policy of zero stocks has shown its limits. Stabilising markets will require the creation of buffer stocks on a world level and major farming countries should provide the impetus,” said an official at FNSEA, France’s main farm union. The farmers will sign a joint declaration calling for greater investment in agriculture to meet the demands of a growing population and ensure farmers could contribute to renewable energy and fighting climate change. Italy’s agriculture minister Luca Zaia said the farmers’ meeting would set the agenda for the G8 agriculture ministers’ meeting in April and would be part of a dossier he would bring to the G8 summit in July.

The heads of business associations from the world’s largest industrialized countries will meet in Santa Margherita di Pula, near Cagliari, Sardinia, on April 23-24, 2009, said Massimo Putzu, the local head of Confindustria, Italy’s industrial employers’ association.

217 Reuters News (March 17, 2009), “G8 farmers mull world grain reserve for stable price.”
They will discuss economic theories to be examined by the G8 at Maddalena Summit in July. Putzu said it was an “honour” to host the “G8 of industrialists,” which would be “at an absolutely international level.”

A model G8 youth summit will take place from March 15-19, 2009, in Milan, Italy. It simulates the work of the real G8 summit. The Italian youth ministry has agreed to sponsor the 2009 event. This 2009 youth summit will be the fourth of its kind. The first was held in Russia in 2006. The second and third took place in Germany and Japan, respectively. According to their website, “The Mission and Vision of the Summit is to be recognized as a panel representing the Voice of the Youth to the Leaders of the G8.” The G8 Youth Summit is organized by young volunteers from the host country with the help of national student teams in the other G8 countries. It receives support from public and private organisations, universities and government agencies, yet the complete format and content is decided upon by the young people themselves. The national teams are responsible for recruiting their national delegation to the summit, raising funds and establishing contacts to public and private sponsors. The host team is responsible for organizing the summit, accommodation, communication and preparation of the summit.
